Asian Pacific Americans are seen as highly competent and hard workers but are underrepresented in executive/administrator positions. Asian Pacific Americans who possess the skills to lead an organization should be able to attain these positions. An important skill that will increase opportunities for promotion is building relationships. In this session, you will meet Asian Pacific Americans who currently hold leadership positions. They will draw from their personal experiences to provide you best practices on how to build key relationships at work. This session is designed to give you the resources to not only build relationships but build your reputation and promote yourself. Administrators will discuss the challenge of building and maintaining key relationships. Building relationships and increasing our promotability is one way we can connect the generations within higher education system. The fact remains: we need more Asian Pacific Americans in leadership positions.
